

Airhead!

The diary of an air conditioning apprentice...

MONDAY

Another tennis embarrassment for my mum at the weekend. One of her breast implants slipped out of place as she was stretching for a volley. When she stood up her chest was pointing in two completely different directions. Confusing for her opponent, I should think. Certainly brings a new meaning to the term 'drop shot'...

Apparently those Penguin guys were also playing there. They kindly took her (screaming) to the private hospital, where she was manipulated and re-aligned by a Swedish breast specialist. Afterwards, she was so flushed with gratitude she called Penguin and asked them to take over our villa's air-con maintenance from Al-Cool. I daren't tell Max - he'd go berserk.

TUESDAY

Spent most of the day looking at Penguin's website. Wow, it's really good - all kinds of useful info on air-con, solar systems and underfloor heating. It took me most of the afternoon to copy their stuff onto Al-Cool's new website. But that should impress Max.

Al-Cool's site isn't officially online yet, so for the moment it says: 'This site is under construction. But if you have an Al-Cool request, please send us an email.'

WEDNESDAY

Got a really weird email request today. Some bar in Faro with an order for 8 crates of beer and 6 bottles of vodka. Bizarre, I don't get it...

FRIDAY

Penguin came to our house today, so I stayed home to spy on them... Blimey, they were very professional and had some smart-looking tools - though I didn't really understand what they were doing. But they found some problems (which they fixed) and told my parents that their air-con was the "Wrong specification, unnecessarily expensive, and a cowboy installation." OMG! It was installed by Max!

Follow Airhead's diary in the Resident every week...
